Andreas Weber manages in an impressive way to bring the socially highly relevant topic of feminism onto the stage in a first-rate and humorous way.

Let's dare a thought experiment! First the men, attention, stay loose: What would happen - just suppose - if the women were right? Hypothetically. And now the women, because it's about you in the second place, just like in real life: What if real men could be feminists? Rarely do female and male silences merge as intimately as after such questions.

Andreas Weber now enters this pause. Where others are still struggling for answers, the everyday expert already comes up trumps with explanations. Sorrowfully acquired, of course. After all, you don't develop feelings without needing to, and no one absorbs the rare art of listening with their mother's milk. Instead, Andreas Weber has fought his way through life and tweeted his way through media communication in particular. As a father of divorce, insights did not come to him through education alone, which he now passes on to us in deliciously distilled form.

Let me just say in advance that a passionate, very individual, irresistibly masculine feminism breaks through here - dear women, take a deep breath and enjoy the goosebumps. Dear men, listen up, learning from Andreas Weber means learning to win!
